The Intersubjectivist's Dilemma

Why is it so difficult for humans to get along? Why is conflict so prevalent? Why do so many conflicts at the international level as well as the marital level seem so irreconcilable?

Intersubjectivity represents a central organizing principle that reflects how many contemporary psychoanalysts view the field of human interaction. In Bonds of Love Jessica Benjamin describes intersubjectivity as the theory that looks at how the individual grows and develops within relationships. She identifies the need for recognition, and the conflict between recognition and assertion as a central organizer of development and social interactions. She states that development moves increasingly toward mutual and self-conscious recognition. If only this were so. This perspective has focused attention on the fundamental difficulty that two people have in relating to each other as equals, and the ease in which relationships tilt along the axis of domination and submission. This difficulty cuts across cultures, national borders, and through intimate relationships, and is central to the challenge of resolving interpersonal and international conflict.

Recognition of another person necessitates separation and distinction: it requires an ability to appreciate twoness. Our differences, physical, aesthetic, ethical, and political, constitute the mental space between two people. Two co-create a common zone where different realities encounter each other, and struggle for recognition and prominence. At the relational gap of contact, there is darkness, doubt and conflict, as well as the possibility for growth and understanding. A 10-year-old Latino boy in my son's class told him disdainfully that he was not white, he was a Jew.

We achieve intimacy through mutual recognition and acceptance. However, we have to overcome the primordial threat of twoness. Separateness and difference evoke anxiety and threaten our sense of self. Stranger anxiety pervades daily social life at the margins of contact. Separation anxiety and fear of loss of autonomy threaten the self at its core. The other comes to represent all that is loathsome, all that is threatening.

The marital relationship is a good measure of our culture's capacity for mutual recognition? Does your subjectivity impinge, threaten, obliterate, or balance, compliment, and enliven mine? I need you to recognize me so that I can recognize you. You need me to recognize you so that you can recognize me. I convey my pain. I assert my position. You hear my assertion. You feel victimized. It is as if we are trying to fit into the same space that can accommodate only one person. My pain implores you to acknowledge your responsibility. Your pain prohibits what feels like submission. Your coldness freezes the air and stings my skin as it protects you. I am doubled up in pain and need to communicate how you hurt me, but within your pain you can't listen.

How does one overcome anguish and victimization in the cradle of intimacy? Can I see the beauty in your autonomy? When will your criticisms lead me to self-knowledge? How can I differentiate accommodation from acceptance and recognition, and assertion from control or domination within the daily grind of intimacy? Recognition of the other can feel like submission. Assertion of self can be experienced by another as domination. It is not only our need for recognition from another, but also our capacity to accept the other's presence non-defensively that challenges our subjectivity. In time of war, in time of pain this capacity is minimal.

The profound difficulty people have recognizing another's subjectivity, underlies the sociological theory called ethnomethodology. Garfinkel articulates this theory in his book Studies in Ethnomethodology published in 1967. It asserts that the social order rests upon commonality of shared knowledge and understanding that is built on the appearance of mutual understanding. For daily interactions to proceed smoothly, individuals need to maintain the appearance of mutual understanding and ignore all manner of differences in perspective. Encountering differences, confusion, and ambiguity lead to defensiveness and hostility that undermines an individual's security, and consequently social stability.

Ethnomethodology highlights the difficulty individuals have in dealing with differences and conflict, and the subsequent strategies they use to obscure these differences. Since we cannot agree to disagree, by default we need to agree to agree and pretend that we don't see the elephant in the room.

Ethnomethodology pits the individual against the group, the need for recognition against the need for stability. It contrasts the assertion of intersubjectivity that there is a need to be recognized with the counter-assertion that there are reasons not to be known.

The therapeutic consultation room is sanctuary for both therapist and client. It optimizes the chance for intimacy and recognition. It challenges the assumptions of ethnomethodology. However, the therapeutic space represents an artificial condition. While there are two subjectivities in the room, there is only one subject struggling to be understood. The other is struggling to understand. This dramatically contrasts the structure that girds most non-therapeutic intimate relationships. When two subjects confront each other as equals, there is a clash of titanic needs. If only my wife could be as understanding as my therapist; if only I could be as understanding of my wife as my therapist is of me. ?
